* Adobe Photoshop Elements: Photoshop-like functions for use in the home. * Adobe Photoshop Lightroom: The modern version of Photoshop with the same features and capabilities as its big brother. Lightroom offers a collection manager to manage all your photos and the lightroom edits made to them, and it has a built-in web editor to share your photos online. * Adobe Photoshop Express: Photoshop's iPhone and Android applications that make creating and sharing images simpler. * Adobe Photoshop for iPad: The Photoshop application on the iPad is available only for advanced image editing, with features similar to those found in Photoshop CS5, including adjustment layers, the Magic Wand, the Healing Brush, and layers. * Adobe Photoshop Lightroom Mobile: A mobile version of Lightroom that enables iPad users to access all the Lightroom editing tools at their fingertips. * Adobe Photoshop for iPhones: This application enables iPhone users to access all the features found on the iPad version (see the preceding bullet). * Adobe Photoshop for Android: This application works like its iPhone cousin (the preceding bullet) and features many of the same editing tools. As the main competitor to Photoshop, you can use Photoshop's features in GIMP (see the earlier section "Using GIMP to manipulate images") and the open Scientists will be allowed to use gene editing techniques to treat human embryos in England after the government's chief scientific adviser agreed this week to draft a limited, ethical framework. The decision, announced on Wednesday by the science minister, David Willetts, comes as scientists and ethicists have called for England's high court to step in and permanently block scientists from using the controversial technique for the benefit of humans. The technique involves removing a single DNA letter from a cell inside a developing embryo to turn off a gene that could be responsible for a condition inherited from a parent. In a statement Willetts said the government had not made any decisions about what changes will be made to embryos and scientists are still free to pursue research into the use of this technique if they wish. Scientists at the Francis Crick Institute in London have used the technique to turn off one of the two copies of a gene linked to inherited mitochondrial disorders and are planning to try it on human embryos in future. The technique could be used to help certain conditions where the genes involved are not inherited, such as muscular dystrophy. It could also be used to stop embryos from producing human organs that may not work or have serious health problems when they are implanted in a mother after the embryo has been grown in the laboratory. The latest twist in the battle over embryos and gene editing came as the government announced it had pledged £7m in funding for research into the use of this technique. "We are making a renewed call on the high court to formally rule on the issue for the foreseeable future so that we know what is permissible and what is not permissible in this field," said Pippa Foulds, emeritus professor of law at Cambridge University. Although Foulds said it was not yet clear how it might stop research on human embryos, the proposal does seem to offer no major restriction for the foreseeable future. Paul Nurse, director of the Francis Crick Institute, said: "In effect, it's a regulation, rather than a ban. The regulation can be reformed or even be amended by parliament. It won't interfere with research. We just can't take any embryo to the clinic." The row over embryos and gene editing is a relatively new one, and the details around its ethics are still being worked out. The controversy has been sparked by two American scientists, George Daley and Earl B

Q: How to speed up Time Machine backup? One of the core issues with Time Machine is that it backs up only the changed files. Unfortunately, that's almost all of them (files that were created/changed/or deleted in the past 1 year, that's most of it). I've started a backup 2 years ago. For each day, I backup 100GB, and for each month I backup 750GB. It would save me a lot of time and space if I could do this: Backup all changed files after last backup Skip all backup (except 1st backup) every week (so, 500GB + 1GB = 1GB) Store all backups and let Time Machine do incremental backups I know it's possible to have some of this done by automation, but is it possible to achieve all of it (I'm on a Mac). A: Add a column to the end of your backup sheet and check it. The column header says "When -

Backup", and the Cell value is the date you put in the "When" column the previous time. A: There is actually a relatively easy solution for doing incremental backups, even to a network share, which is in a way auto-activating them. You don't need to use a separate folder or a time machine-compatible drive. What I did, and it works like a charm, is to set up an NTFS incremental backup with MacCloner. It's a light weight solution, that is fast and has clean interfaces. You can put an external firewire drive with a bunch of unallocated space, and drag and drop the compressed backups from TimeMachine from MacCloner there. They will be automatically decompressed and expanded, and then TimeMachine will start restoring them from the most recent one. You can choose to restore them in any order, but I recommend starting at the oldest. The empty external drive will act as a FireWire hard drive. It will give you about 30 GB of space for TimeMachine to expand to if it ever runs out of space in the default location. If you ever need more space, you can add a drive and keep saving to it. I never set TimeMachine to get my full backups at once. You will need to manually restart your Mac to activate the backups (Hint: Did you change anything in your backup sources?). Note: Make sure
