MTX was dissolved in an alkaline gelatin solution and the resulting solution was neutralized with a basic calcium solution. The gelatin precipitate was then dispersed in a 0.7% aqueous CaCl2 solution to produce a gelatin dispersion. From this dispersion a 0.4% aqueous gelatin solution was added to induce gelation. The gelatin solution was injected into an aqueous phase of MTX-gelatin solution. The injection rate, MTX concentration of the gelatin solution, and pH of the aqueous phase were varied to control the size of the microspheres. The microspheres were then injected into a collagen sponge, which was incubated in a fetal calf serum-containing medium. The release rate of MTX from the microspheres was relatively fast and the release pattern was exponential. These results suggested that the microspheres controlled the drug release kinetics.col_assert(is_caption(item), "item is not a caption");

The information on the Open dialog box, usually in the form of the Document icon, lists the version number of the program that created the document. The information on the Printing, Compiling, and Worksheets dialog boxes typically lists the edition, release date, the printer of the document, and the program or version number of the program used to compile a document. Because different Office programs use different names for their version numbers, versions of these programs from different years are rarely identical. For example, Microsoft Works for Macintosh has a Document icon that lists Version 1.1 in the Open dialog box and Release 3.2 in the Print dialog box. The same document might list Version 7.0 in the Open dialog box for Microsoft Word for Windows and Release 4.2 for WordPerfect 6.0 on Windows 3.1x.
