Stored passwords are at risk of being stolen by people who gain access to your computer. Some programs intercept keystrokes, screen shots and passwords, and they can be disguised as standard or undocumented processes and programs. The process by which your passwords are being stolen is called "keystroke logging". This includes the use of "backdoors", which are programs, usually hidden inside key-loggers, that are hard coded to route all of your keystrokes to a second computer. This means that the second computer can gain access to your internet or email messages, and access your most sensitive information including your passwords and other critical data. This requires no special applications. All that is needed is a third-party hardware device that the logger is unable to access. The second is to prevent the logger from accessing your computer in the first place. This requires a combination of third-party tools and operating system upgrades. How to remove keylogging The first step in trying to remove keylogging is to look at what software you have on your computer. The first step is to uninstall any spyware that is currently active. Next, you have to look at what additional programs are running and where they are accessing the internet. If you find that any of your software is trying to access a remote computer, or an internet site, you need to check what that program is doing. If that program does not do what it says on the box, then you need to remove or disable it. This is also true for adware. Make
