Though equipped with millions of brain cells, which seem highly organized, humans nevertheless appear incredibly naïve when faced with predators that exploit the most basic of elements for survival. Satellites certainly provide a great view from above, but our knowledge of the 'bads' is as yet slight. "One guy noticed something flying down that looked like a kite," said Kevin

Fisher, an astronomer at the SETI Institute in Mountain View, California. "A cacophony of trumpets sounded in the aeronautics community." Since then, astronomers have identified 17 alien species using a well-familiar behavior called biofluorescence. It's a biological trait that makes organisms glow in the dark, but which also brings them the attention of stealthy predators. The creatures emit red light; the response time on a camera is much slower than that of humans. It was discovered in the Arctic, and it was discovered in the Antarctic Kevin Fisher (left), an astronomer at the SETI Institute in Mountain View, California. US military chemical laboratory finds potential Islamic State (ISIS) chemical weapons – and doesn't even know what to do with it The Pentagon has found "potential chemical weapons" in the possession of Islamic State and left it "extremely vulnerable to the militants who may seek to use it," a US official said. All that remains is to find out whether the weapons were obtained through an international black market or are being openly sold by ISIS, which officials said had the materials it needed to construct a chemical weapon at its bases in Syria and Iraq. "Our analysis suggested that ISIS was able to generate them at their bases in Syria and Iraq," said the senior administration official who spoke on condition of anonymity to discuss ongoing intelligence matters. The official said it was "extremely vulnerable" in terms of its "extremely sophisticated components," which would be difficult to detect if it was moved or destroyed. The discovery, reported late last month by The New York Times, added urgency to an ongoing search of territory controlled by the terrorist group. A chemical weapons expert said the ISIS materials are usable for the generation of sarin – a nerve agent – mustard gas and VX – the most toxic known nerve agent – and found that the militants had the equipment to make them. He said that ISIS's agents also likely have the knowledge to operate such munitions. The US official said all of this is being done in cooperation with the UN, which has the declared goal of securing the world's chemical weapons stockpiles and preventing their use by terrorist or rogue groups. The official also said the materials were so "fragile" that in order to even assess whether they were usable, the US forces in the Middle East would need to vaporize them in a controlled environment. "How the hell would we go about doing that? We don't have a workable prototype for this," the official said, adding that the only thing known for sure is that the US does not want these materials fall into the hands of another terrorist group. There is no assessment as to when the military will actually make an attempt to vaporize the materials, as officials said this is an extremely complex task that requires a lot of planning. This, according to an official, is due to “the lack of a proven prototype,” adding that even though the US has
