Planning for Pendergast 17 August 2016 @ 2:00 pm - 4:00 pm I am, in fact, feeling my wearied heart lift a little. By this, I mean that my mind has cleared, the pressure from the classroom is off, and the baby being-that-weighs-down has been banished back into the darkness whence it came. If you knew me, you'd be asking yourself: Are you all right? Can you be all right? You'd be more likely to ask me this question then you might be the other way around. Your first thought: "Would you like a cup of coffee?" Your next thought: "Are you dead?" These questions were always the safest. And for most of my life, I was pretty much okay with that. But if you've spent time with me these past 15 years, or any amount of time in my life, it's safe to say that you know me better than that. So, when I work out, I like to think of myself as being in great shape. And I am in great shape. Don't forget to let your need to hear compassion play out; it's what draws us all to one another because it is our invisible thread, the one that keeps the sweater's stitches together. The choices we're making in the classroom live out precisely on this thread, the one that connects us to one another and to the scene we hope to be. It's not a guessing game; we can see it in a child's questioning stare–that look that questions–and it is entirely present in her voice when a question is not answered. This thread is neither the one that gets cut when threads fray or unravel, nor the one that is severed when the sweater is not completed. It is the one that we sew back together again. In the summer's increasing heat and haze, in the thrumming of the basketball with every shot, in the blinding and brilliant June sun, in the heightening of the scents in the jasmine, in the cinnamon-and-dried-mango afterglows of childhood memories that I think about deeply, I feel my wearied heart lift, and I consider my plans again. Right before Pendergast, just before, I'll be glad to be learning to be done. I�
