In recent years there has been a growing consensus that the risk of cancer in adult patients exposed to radiation is low. In light of the evidence, physicians are now being pressured to lessen patient doses in response to effective techniques such as iterative reconstruction. In children, however, the benefits of examinations have not been clearly established; in addition, overdiagnosis may be common and the risk of cancer is likely to be substantial. Patients, their families and the public should be aware of the risks posed by medical imaging and their need to be protected in the name of safety. Medical imaging of children is not risk-free, but it can be lowered by increasing their understanding of the process, by utilizing effective dose algorithms in image interpretation and by providing patient education. Radiography of children should be based on diagnostic need rather than the age of the patient. Further studies to assess the risks of low-dose examinations are necessary to properly guide patient

Q: Extracting URLs from a web page I'm trying to extract all the links on a web page, and convert them to HTML links as part of an extention for my browser. I know I could do this using curl, but given that I'll have to perform this operation for all the URLs on all the pages on this site, it would probably be good to do this natively. My question is, is there a simple and easy way of getting all the tags in an HTML page? Perhaps using regex or a simple API? A: If you're developing a Chrome extension, you can call: `chrome.tabs.executeScript({ file:'mypage.html' }, function (tab) { chrome.pageInfo.currentURI.spec; });` If you're developing an add-on for Firefox, you can call: `document.querySelectorAll('a').forEach((element) => { element.href; });` A: If you're using jQuery, you can just use the `$()` function to select all elements, and then use `get()` to get each of their href properties. $
