If you don't know what is Gladiator School then you may be familiar with the name of the series of games published by Mega Game Studios. In this game you are tasked with the task of fighting and slaughtering your opponents for survival. You may also be asked to go on a quest to find mystical creatures and other items. It also features various mini-games including workouts, running, sword battles and combat training. If that was a bit boring for you, we have also included a daily challenge mode that will have you doing things like swimming, jogging and similar. Gladiator School is a two-dimensional game and is entirely back-view only. To create a more authentic experience for the games we hired two Italian designers for the graphics and sound effects. The graphic is a mix of 2D and 3D and there are many two-dimensional elements and effects. The sword movements are mostly animated and there are a few kind of attacks that we call hits. There is also an item system where you can gain experience points and obtain new power-ups and equipment. As the game progresses, you will unlock more equipment that can be equipped onto weapons. The stamina meter will refill faster as you fight. Check out our other games:

What's new:

for the retail masses Since the early days of skateboarding, the sport has been defined by how much can you see of that board in your peripheral vision. In the past, skateboards were bought solely for their ability to sit -tall -footed next to your bed, or perched atop the glass table in front of your living room couch. It might not have inspired the interest of a dollhouse tableau, but at least you could wake up to see the board. Little had I understood that skateboarding could be that close to your face. How wrong I was. This is what a brand, distributed within the United States' highest-capacity distribution system, can do to you. This, and all the other impressive facets of Grind, take a look at the website or download the app that is combined with this magazine, and you can see that Driven by desire, and personal ambition, Grind is set on a mission to create an 'app all skateboarding' - asking if there isn't a mass market ready product on the market, why not invite people to make it themselves? "By doing that," Burnell says, "we get skateboarders involved in the product - they get to see it, they get to touch it, they get to ride it. They get to take all this stuff that is great about skateboarding in their living rooms, in their bedrooms, their cars, whatever, and then go out to the garage and do their own thing, create their own rules, create their own park." Everything Grind does has conscious thought and a simplistic feel behind it. Whether that's for commercial space issues or perhaps accessibility is a part of this seemingly simple nature. Or, maybe it's nice to live and train within a geographical village? Whatever the reason, it makes for a refreshing discovery. For Burnell, the arcade skateboarder, a desire to play this kind of game is fostered by the developer kit that accompanies a project: a computer system, a skateboard deck, and a bit of paint. "It's interesting to me, because I've always had this fascination," he says, "About now, when I see that board and I see that trick, is that same thing that you're doing right now. That's how I get stoked, thinking about how that always could be." Figure with licence
