The dopamine D(4) receptor (DRD4) may be a candidate gene for alcohol use disorder (AUD). We tested for association between the 1469T/C polymorphism, which is one of several transcriptional regulatory variants of the DRD4 gene, and the diagnosis of AUD in two independent samples. Data were obtained from 165 patients with AUD and 563 unrelated controls from Oulu, Finland. The 796C/T variant, which is in strong linkage disequilibrium with the 1469T/C variant, was examined in 562 patients and 457 controls from Nijmegen, The Netherlands. Patients were diagnosed using DSM-III criteria. Alcohol-dependence diagnosis was also verified by structured clinical interviews. We compared the frequency of the 1469T/C genotype, allele, and haplotype in patients and controls. In our Finnish sample, the 1469C allele was associated with the diagnosis of AUD. The 1469C allele did not affect the response to alcohol in a human neurophysiological study and did not modify the DRD4 messenger RNA level. There was no difference between patients and controls in the frequency of the 796T allele. In the Dutch sample, the 1469C allele was associated with the diagnosis of alcohol dependence, as in the Finnish sample. The association was significant in women only, and was observed only in cases where both women had received treatment for alcohol dependence. In the Dutch sample, the 1469C/C genotype was overrepresented in cases versus controls. The differential association with AUD in the two samples may be due to the lack of significance in the European American sample. The DRD4 1469C allele may
