During the Reformation, certain denominations of Protestantism began to question the legality of existing Roman Catholic institutions and practices. The Anabaptists were one of these denominations. They believed Jesus had abolished all state authority, and would not support any government that replaced the Roman Catholic Church with a king, thus disobeying Jesus' words and inciting violence and opposition from many Protestant sects. The Anabaptists had also struggled with the Catholic idea of Purgatory, which encouraged Catholics to visit the church every Sunday to pray for the dead. This conflicted with the Anabaptist notion that the kingdom of heaven had been arrived at and there was no need to worry about the dead. So, you have a radical group with little support, and a "King of peace" who is trying to turn the world upside down. The Anabaptists did not believe in monarchy, and sought an ideology that would be more egalitarian, and the idea of an independent, democratic state came up in early discussions of the Christian faith as an ideological alternative. So, one wonders: how much support did the Anabaptists have for democratic states, or did the state-centrism of the Catholic church simply supersede the early Anabaptist desire for democracy and individual self-government? A: This came up during the Anabaptist-Catholic Church talks that preceded the siege of Münster, as the Monuments of Primitive Christianity have recorded. At the time, the Anabaptist-style government was being considered as an alternative to the monarchical government and the resulting destruction, suffering and martyrdom. In the discussions, the reason the Anabaptist support for democracy was given by the Anabaptists as follows: Now some shall be taken and
