Distribution of NMDA receptors in the substantia nigra and ventral tegmental area of normal rats and of those subjected to 6-hydroxydopamine lesions. The distribution of N-methyl-D-aspartate (NMDA) receptors in the substantia nigra and ventral tegmental area has been studied in normal rats and rats in which the nigral dopaminergic cell bodies have been destroyed using 6-hydroxydopamine (6-OHDA). The binding of [3H]MK-801 was found to be significantly reduced by 6-OHDA lesions in both the substantia nigra pars compacta (SNc) and ventral tegmental area (VTA). It is concluded that the changes in glutamate receptor binding observed following 6-OHDA lesions may be due to a loss of the receptors in the SNc and the VTA as a result of the lesions. The present invention relates to an automatic packaging method and device, and more particularly to an improved method and system for packaging beverage containers, such as cans and bottles, that, in one step, automatically carry out several functions including dispensing a paper web, folding or gathering said web, and pushing the folded web into a cell in a stack. Most beverage containers, such as cans and bottles, are automatically packaged in automated can and bottle packing machines. In such machines, after the containers are loaded, a web of film is automatically pulled over the containers and sealed thereabout to form a rigid, flexible package. The rigid flexible package is formed by feeding a web of paper or other suitable material, having a moisture barrier layer, into a folding machine and then folding the web to form a "shingled" or zig-zag folded web. The folded web is then run through a guillotine-like cutter to cut the web into individual packets or articles, which are then deposited onto a packaging table. After the package has been cut and dehumidified, the package is then advanced to the filling and capping station. In the filling station, a filling nozzle is inserted into the now open end of the package and filled with the desired beverage product. After the beverage product is dispensed, a cap is inserted into the package and affixed to the package. There have been many attempts in the
