Greetings, I don't want to show you a make-believe how to do-it-yourself project that leaves you with a complicated situation once the project is finished. I am searching for a simple tutorial, a step-by-step-project that does not require you to have or buy any additional material/hardware. Just grab a router and a desktop printer. Does anybody have an idea, suggestion or reference? Please leave a comment if you are aware of such a tutorial or project. Thank you in advance. Greetings, Koen A: simply look for documentation on such projects for example asrock nano sx40 form base, or the asrock nano z87 or the asrock nanopc z87 s the printer installs as standard network printer. Q: How to call Python Script from within a .bashrc script I have a .bashrc script that I need to run from multiple terminals. If the script is called from within the shell, it works fine and executes the script just as it should. However, if I want to call the script from within a script (say a .bashrc), the script simply sits and waits for the terminal to end. How can I make the script run within .bashrc script? .bashrc looks like this: # try to load the conkyrc file if [ -r "$HOME/conky_line" ]; then source "$HOME/conky_line" else echo "Can't find conkyrc" fi # this prints conky status update on mouse move if [ -r "$HOME/conky_update" ]; then source "$HOME/conky_update" else echo "Can't find conky_update" fi # this prints conky display for current window if [ -r "$HOME/conky_display" ]; then source "$HOME/conky_display" else echo "Can't find conky_display" fi # this prints conky shadow from top to bottom if [ -r "$HOME/conky_shadow" ]; then source "$HOME/conky_shadow" else echo "Can't find conky_6d1f23a050
