In May 2014, a data leak of more than thirty million customer records related to about 40 lenders and more than 50 credit reporting agencies was discovered by an employee at credit reporting agency Equifax. The leak included names, birth dates, Social Security numbers, addresses, and transaction information. For Equifax, it marked the third such incident in four years. Equifax disclosed the breach in September, days after almost seven million individuals were affected. The breach compromised credit data of U.S. consumers, including social security numbers. More than a dozen consumer groups filed a joint lawsuit against Equifax on November 21, arguing that the company failed to notify consumers for months after discovering the breach. The company agreed to pay $70 million in fines to the U.S. Federal Trade Commission and the individual consumers, who together will receive $20 million. As a result of the incident, a consortium of financial services companies announced that they would no longer support the use of social security numbers. In September 2014, security researchers at Quo Vadis Labs discovered a sophisticated spear-phishing attack against a Midwestern manufacturer. Within hours of the discovery, Facebook announced a separate attack that compromised the e-mail addresses and phone numbers of a small number of users of its service. Facebook stated that the attack resulted from the posting of a fake job offer that linked to a malicious URL and was subsequently passed through to users by others. The hack was also discovered by third-party security researchers who notified Facebook. Facebook disabled the malware and deleted the personal information of the affected users.

In November 2015, more than half a million Twitter users were affected by a Twitter phishing scam. The scam used a fake iOS App Store to try and trick users into downloading malware. Only a few people paid the $100 installation fee, but those who did installed malware on their phones and became part of a botnet. In October 2016, researchers at FireEye said at least 30,000 users had their SMS messages sent to the phone numbers used by the attackers. If the users had their phones unlocked while the attackers retrieved the messages, they could be used to log into the victims' accounts. In January 2015, a domain name investor discovered that a hacker had used his domain through which to commit a number of attacks. The domain registrar noticed suspicious activity on the domain and contacted the investor, who discovered that servers had been created on the domain and then left up and down for five months. The servers were used to pull more than $1.4 million from victims' bank accounts. In October 2016, British telecommunications firm TalkTalk was hacked by the group that came to be known as Carbanak, which ran the email accounts of UK banks and other firms. This led to the theft of numerous bank accounts. Carbanak was part of a larger network of hackers that the FBI suspected was in operation since at least 2009. The hackers used "watering holes" in which they placed websites that were either vulnerable or took over by exploiting a vulnerability in the website. Targets included the Polish telecom firm SuperWeb, the Brazilian Web hosting company Site5, and the online travel company Momondo. 5ec8ef588b
