[ENFD-5310] Mao Ichimichi - A Distant Shore

Watch Mao Ichimichi - A Distant Shore - ENFD-5310. Apple has finally gotten the permission it needs to open up Siri's natural language processing and speech recognition capabilities for use by third-party developers, CNET has learned. If the changes Apple has agreed to go through happen as described by an anonymous source with knowledge of the new agreement, they should open up the Siri developer platform to third-party app makers in October. Siri's natural language processing and speech recognition were hidden behind the company's vast walled garden. Apple was the only one that could request a usage license from the company for its Siri APIs, which were used to create third-party chat apps, game makers and other types of utility apps. That walled garden worked well for Apple, but it also kept outside developers out of the game. The Apple source's word of the agreement is that Apple and SAP, which supplies the analytics software Apple uses for Siri, have agreed to open up those services. SAP has previously said that it was not interested in making its APIs public, but it has been in talks with Apple about opening Siri to developers. Both Apple and SAP declined comment on the agreement. Under the new arrangement, third-party developers can use the voice-recognition services to create apps that make use of Siri's "intents" or tasks. These include checking the weather forecast, making a restaurant reservation, and getting driving directions. Apple also allows developers to use Siri's "intent handler" for third-party apps. That is the way developers can create a separate Siri-aware application that handles intents for any app that can request a usage license. Siri is in many ways the crown jewel of Apple's operation, with Apple expected to make $10 billion in revenue from the Siri app store, according to a recent research note from Morgan Stanley analyst Katy Huberty. But the answer to what could be the most important question in Apple's recent history — how to make Siri more relevant, useful and useful to users — has been hidden. Siri is a literal answer to its users' question of "What can you do for me?" It's the Holy Grail of software. Part of the problem with Siri is that, due to Apple's walled garden, it was only using the very primitive Natural Language Processing software and voice recognition that was available on iOS and Mac and not the full capability that was available to developers. Related stories Apple's recent announcement that it is refocusing its Siri team around the idea of "bringing the most relevant experiences to its users," along with the upcoming iOS 8 and OS X Yosemite, is evidence that the company is preparing to make changes to allow outside developers to use the more capable and powerful voice recognition that was originally introduced with the iPhone 4. Rhode Island Democratic Senator Sheldon Whitehouse took a strong stand against the impeachment of President Donald Trump during a Senate hearing on Wednesday, saying that going down the path of impeachment would be “counterproductive” and “self-destructive.” “Impeachment is a very serious matter, and as far as I’m concerned, it’s counterproductive. It’s not going to get the truth to the American people. There are other ways to go,” Whitehouse said during the hearing. During his remarks, Whitehouse pointed to the recent film “Impeachment: American Crime,” which alleges that Trump committed impeachable offenses while running for president. 5ec8ef588b
