The accessories are fantastic, but the case adds lots of value. Apple Battery Case gives you battery power when you are on the go, a brilliant concept. Without the Battery Case, you cannot use it as a regular iPad. With it, it's stand-alone laptop. And for people who need to sync data with a computer, Kadenze makes it easy, using Kadenze Car Charger and a SIM card combination to wirelessly charge iPad and other mobile devices. But let's take a look at some standard accessories: Apple Smart Keyboard, Apple Magic Trackpad, Apple Pencil, Apple Smart Cover, Smart Keyboard Folio case/keyboard case, Apple Smart Cover, and the Apple MFI-certified LogiBeam Wireless charging. I was quite skeptical about the Apple Pencil. I mean, it's not like the stylus is new - it is not really new; it's old technology, after all. Yes, the CMOS sensor and new A-Pen technology definitely results in a more responsive stylus that is more precise in use, but it is still not miraculous. It still resembles a stylus, or at least a rodent that has caught on to using a stylus as an instrument of drawing. And in my testing, I have found that it does not feel like a natural way to draw on the iPad. Like an instrument, I worry that it may start to feel unnatural to some people. Like most of the other tools, Spot Healing Brush has a sidebar with a preview of the result of the healing applied. In the upper left, I opted to make the white plane of the original image almost invisible by enlarging the gradient to get a slightly "in focus" look. The screen shot shows the result of what I term a Type 1 adjustment. For users roaming the web, I feel that a better-looking result may be achieved by concentrating more on getting the focus just right. Then again, if the target is fairly small, perhaps you are fine with the pre-adjusted mask or the Type 1 preference.
