Estrogen-induced changes in activity and mRNA levels of the multiple forms of mouse placental creatine kinase. The cellular distribution of creatine kinase (CK) in the mouse placenta was studied with regard to its effect of estrogen. The activities of the seven CK bands were altered in the time course of ovariectomy and estrogen treatment. The CK activity was mainly present in the cytosol of trophoblast giant cells. Compared with those of ovariectomized controls, the activities of CK bands 7, 8 and 10 were increased in the cytosol, CK band 3 in the cytosol and mitochondrial, CK bands 4 and 5 in the mitochondrial of intact animals treated with estrogen, and CK band 3 was increased in the cytosol and mitochondrial, and CK band 4 was increased in the cytosol and mitochondrial of intact animals treated with both estrogen and progesterone. Treatment with both estrogen and progesterone induced a further increase in the activities of CK bands 4 and 5 in the cytosol and mitochondrial of intact animals. A portion of the increase in CK activity of cytosol and mitochondrial, was abolished by cycloheximide. The steady-state level of CK mRNA in the mouse placenta was detected by Northern blot analysis. The electrophoretic mobility of CK mRNA differed between cytosolic and mitochondrial CK. The level of cytosolic CK mRNA was increased in the placenta of intact animals treated with estrogen and progesterone, but the level of mitochondrial CK mRNA was decreased in the placenta of intact animals treated with estrogen and progesterone. 67 F.2d 716 (1933) PRUDENTIAL INS.
