General manager Bob Quinn needed to turn things around, and he did that in short order. By rebuilding the offensive line and bolstering the defense with key free-agent signings, Quinn addressed the Lions' most pressing needs. And after things turned around last season, it's not unrealistic to think that Quinn can turn things around again this season. The Lions have a new head coach, Matt Patricia, and several key offensive weapons returning. As long as Detroit can prevent its defense from falling apart — and it did a decent job of that last season — it's easy to see the Lions emerging as a force in the NFC North. Here are five reasons why the Lions can return to the playoffs next season. PRICE SELLS The Lions have never had an elite quarterback. They've had solid ones and they've had good ones. But they've never had one who could be the difference-maker in the postseason. But thanks to the recent trade for quarterback Mitch Trubisky, the Lions finally have that piece, and he's only going to get better with a year under his belt. Trubisky, who can make all of the throws, is the type of playmaker the Lions have needed. He has a quick release, and he's accurate on the short to intermediate level. That ability to deliver a ball on time should help Matthew Stafford, who struggled to connect with some of his receivers last season. More importantly, Trubisky's ability to drive
