Eighteen patients with aortic stenosis underwent pre- and postoperative hemodynamic measurements using a Swan-Ganz catheter. Despite reduction of left ventricular stroke work and systolic pressure after aortic valve replacement, the stroke volume did not change, but it was increased after bypass. The arteriovenous oxygen content difference did not change. Left ventricular filling pressure was elevated after aortic valve replacement, suggesting increased left ventricular afterload. The cardiac index was not changed by aortic valve replacement. Coronary sinus blood flow decreased by 25% after aortic valve replacement and remained low despite increased aortic pressure and cardiac index. Thus, an increased afterload, secondary to aortic valve replacement, may have led to a redistribution of the left ventricular output.Q:
