The firm estimates that private insurers spent an average $315 million annually on about 9,000 physician performance measures, and 94 percent of those measures were implemented by the end of 2014. While the use of incentives can increase quality, there are concerns that pay-for-performance information is making health care a numbers game in which providers try to gain financial rewards from being the most efficient. And the financially squeezed payer landscape is creating new challenges, the report notes. The following factors could threaten pay-for-performance: Difficulties in measuring performance. According to the report, pay-for-performance measures are being implemented without a cohesive data infrastructure. Only 42 percent of payers have organizational units dedicated to collecting data and 80 percent of payers use multiple sources of data. “Payers are struggling to collect performance data, which has limited the value of those measures, and will only become more challenging to gather as payer reimbursement is reengineered under the new health reform,” the report says. Scrutiny. “The increased need for regulators to oversee pay-for-performance and the corresponding impact on the private sector’s ability to engage in this activity has led to increasingly complex transactions requiring more transparency and oversight,” the report says. “Fewer sponsors, whose participation is tied to incentive-based payments, have the resources to undertake these additional financial and accounting challenges.” P 79a2804d6b
