I'm making a game, and I'm trying to decide whether or not to allow the users to change the background color of the font that's used. If they use the default color, it's black, if they use something else, it's that color, obviously. The other issue here is that it would seem that the users could find themselves in a situation in which they modify a color for a sign that changes on load, for example. The font is going to be a pretty big thing. I'm currently sitting on the fence about the design, so I thought I'd ask the community and see if there were any type of design decisions or best practices I should follow in this situation. I'm unsure as to whether or not the static approach would be a good idea, or whether it would be better to modify it as I go. The other thing that's sort of a tie-in is that I'd also like to keep the ColorChooser ability open. EDIT To answer the comments, no, the background color is obviously not different when you select a different text. It's just a question of whether or not it's too confusing for the user, if they accidently do that. A: As noted by @Tunaki in his comment, the static approach is a bad idea. One problem with allowing the user to change the look of the font is that you are introducing a major change for every font that you don't permit to be customized. This will likely result in a poor user experience as your users become frustrated at having to
