Removing antivirus software from a computer can be very risky. It is very easy to reinstall antivirus software, but it can be very dangerous to remove antivirus software without knowing what you are doing. Antivirus software will run in the background and monitor your computer. If something were to happen to the antivirus software, such as your computer being infected with a virus, the software could cause your computer to crash or even turn off. You might get the symptoms of the virus, such as a slow computer or a system error.

- The input device is a joy to work with - it's comfortable, responsive, allows you to position two fingers as one to create a correct angle, and allows you to use both touch and the pinch to zoom and pans images in the app. - The Input device makes use of the iPad's special abilities. The IPS display means that you can easily zoom into cropping by scrolling and can see the effects of your crop at any size even on a retina display - zoom out, pan the photo, and you can see the zoomed out cropping in front of you. Scaling works the same way, only now you can scale non-rectangular shapes, and you can rotate them with a rotation tool. Rotatable shapes use the same tool/hand guidelines as non-rotatable shapes, it's just that when you overlap the shape with the scroll/pan tool you get the rotation tool. - Most importantly, the iPad can be much more than just a display surface, so the dynamic adjustment tools for light levels, white balance, etc. become much more powerful. You can use the opacity slider to make a photo completely opaque, for instance. You can easily blend color, luminance, and saturation layers into each other, and blend all these together for a final simulation of a range of light levels. An advanced format like the JPEG 2000 that stores images more efficiently than the JPEG format with fewer restrictions on size, quality, and de-compression is always a plus when it comes to quality. This format is specular to my line work, but I have to test them all for myself.

By now, the meme about web-based social media icon styling is universal. There are countless variations, but the general gist of the bunch is that elements should look good on any type of device (phone, tablet, desktop, etc.), and the "optimal width" should probably be around roughly 40 pixels (or 200 pixels on a phone screen). What's so wrong with this rule? You might be shocked to find out that this, at least in my opinion, is actually common sense. In a world where the vast majority of web browsers will render websites perfectly fine, a 40-pixel minimum width makes complete sense: It lets you ensure the smallest, smallest number of pixels get wasted on your website. But what if your website gets hundreds or thousands of visitors a day? What if you have a very wide format that, as it turns out, people aren't using? What if you're on a mobile device and you don't want to have to resize a web page? A new fascinating article from Mozilla's web builders addresses the question "How To Avoid Not Measuring Up" in a browser-friendly way. Essentially, there's some real issues with a site that will only look right on certain devices. Ironically enough, they're not very big issues at all. Even with large display, a mobile device, or a screen that can't quite scale, your design should still be readable. If you make your primary goal "readable" in print, that will be your primary goal online as well. And the time it takes to make a web visit on a lunch break into a 30-45 minute interaction is a minute when you might as well do something productive. After an hour, having the time to optimize your site is never going to happen. e3d0a04c9c
