Adobe's newest version of Photoshop is called Photoshop CC and offers a web-based streaming preview of your image to check for any spacing or color issues. If you install Photoshop, the Preview pane includes a preview like the web-based one. My personal experience was that when I try to use the layer(s) merge function while working in the layers panel, it often causes the software to crash, sometimes even closing the whole program. It seemed to me that there are too many steps involved in creating a brand new Zbrush file and also that it was fairly complicated. I'm much better with the boolean and filter functions, so I did lots of that over the course of the project. On the plus side, I was impressed with the number and quality of the brushes, and the output and control over how these shape round edges. Regardless of its function or site, the new Photoshop is a feast for the eyes. Not a single pixel goes uncreated. Each idea is fascinating. Nothing is missing, so there's nothing to critique. However, in-designing a new HTML site, there's no Elance. Or Renderosity. Or iStockPhoto? There are no websites or plugins that I know of where you can upload your own designs, and send them to Photoshop. Lightroom 5 has a redesigned, but familiar, interface. You can still navigate and manage your collections, tags, and workflows as easily as ever. When you open a catalog, it takes about six seconds for the first layout to appear on screen. This time might seem like an eternity, however, it's almost negligible compared to the time it takes for Lightroom to import all the information into the new version. After that, the import process is lightning-quick. When you go back to the catalog, the layout refreshes instantly.
